You decide

Teacher credentials receive scrutiny, careful review

If a group of education deans gets its way, most of the nation’s education majors will find it much harder to graduate from college in the near future.

Under the group’s plan, students intending to become “regular career teachers” would need six years of study to get teaching certificates, while “professional career teachers” would have to obtain a second advanced degree emphasizing leadership.

The group of deans, from 33 “leading research universities,” which named itself the Holmes Group in honor of legendary Harvard education dean Henry W. Holmes, hopes to lobby other teacher colleges in its efforts to create “a new type of teacher” by making teaching a prestigious, highly-paid profession.

In its founding statement, released last week at Michigan State University, The Holmes Group said it hoped to overhaul the education programs by 1990.

Thereby, presumably, “a苇realization of institutions to move in this direction,” said Richard Powell of the Holmes Coordinating Committee.

Powell, a Michigan State education professor, helped present the group’s suggestions to the Academic Vice Presidents Committee of the National Association of State Universities and Land Grant Colleges.

Powell said the report was “received very positively.”

The Holmes report coincides with similar findings released two weeks ago by the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching.

The Carnegie study also suggested tightening professional standards to get greater recognition and rewards for teachers.

“I won’t be enough to prepare a new type of teacher,” Prueitt says. “We need incentives for holding the best and the brightest.”

To do so, the Holmes plan would aim to create “career professionals,” who have extensive academic training and can lead the profession into better supervising, and developing and evaluating coursework.

According to the plan, both “career professional teachers” and “regular career teachers” would get undergraduate degrees in academic subjects, rather than in education.

Students would then devote a fifth year of study to “learning to teach.”

They would spend a sixth year in a supervised internship to complete graduate requirements.

Both professional teachers would have to earn a second advanced degree, and then would qualify for higher pay.

Powell envisioning career professional teachers, comprising 20 to 25 percent of the nation’s teaching force, forming an elite corps for the profession.

To work, the plan would need the help of institutions that enrolling teachers as well as those that train them.

For example, elementary and high schools would have to prohibit instructors from teaching subjects other than their academic major.

While Powell admits 10 The Holmes Group proposal is a radical one, he doesn’t believe its rigorous training requirements will discourage prospective teachers.

“We can change the workplace, conditions and compensation,” Powell says. “They will know their career will reward them for their efforts.”

But the plan may not be for all colleges.

While its goals and strategies for improving teacher education may be appropriate for teacher training programs in other institutions, they have been designed with the research universities in mind,” explains Judith Lerner, dean of Michigan State’s College of Education and chair of The Holmes Group.

Nevertheless, group organizes hope to sign up a total of 100 schools in its reform efforts by January, when the final version of its report, “Goals for Educating Teachers as Professionals,” is published.

The Coastal Carolina soccer team defeated Winthrop College, 2-1, in a return game played Saturday afternoon. Winthrop played the 1983 South Carolina Class A state champions, the Chanticleers, who were defeated in the regional championship game. In the opening round, they were blown out of the tournament by South Carolina, 1-0, in the first game. This is the second game of the tournament, and the Eagles entered as if they had the heart and soul of their team. The Eagles did not let the Eagles have their easy game. The Eagles fell short on their first half attack and the Eagles scored their first goal in the second half. The Eagles scored their second goal when the Eagles scored in the second half.
